The following is a transcript of a radio interview made available to employees of CVS Health Corporation:

CVS Health CEO on Aetna Deal

NPR: Morning Edition

DAVID GREENE, NPR, MORNING EDITION HOST:

It's morning edition from NPR News, I'm David Greene.

STEVE INSKEEP, NPR, MORNING EDITION HOST:

And I'm Steve Inskeep. A CVS Pharmacy commercial from 1990 portrays the pharmacist as a friend, a confidant.

CUSTOMER, CVS COMMERCIAL:

Judy, I'm so embarrassed. The school nurse sent Lisa home today with this note.

PHARMACISTS, CVS COMMERCIAL:

Head lice really isn't that unusual Gale.

ANNOUNCER, CVS COMMERCIAL:

Personal questions, private conversations.

INSKEEP:

That is the image that a pharmacy would prefer. Your actual experience at an actual pharmacy may be a bit more impersonal. But CVS Health, as the company now calls itself, is pushing to provide a more comprehensive service. The company is buying the insurance firm Aetna, which we should disclose, is an occasional sponsor of NPR programming. The CEO of CVS Health, Larry Merlo, says he wants to reinvent his stores as healthcare hubs, providing more consistent care to people with chronic conditions like diabetes.

LARRY MERLO, CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, CVS HEALTH:

Imagine a world where that patient can walk into a CVS pharmacist [sic]. They can engage with a nutritionists about their diet. They can talk to a nurse practitioner, perhaps have their blood glucose level checked. Talk to their pharmacist about medication.

INSKEEP:

And the company hopes to be more competitive in a tough industry. Merlo told us how he thinks Aetna can help them.

MERLO:

You think about the capabilities that Aetna has in terms of its ability to utilize information and you combine that with the convenience and the human touch of CVS, and it gives us the opportunity to be more proactive in terms of how we engage patients and help them achieve the best health possible for them.

INSKEEP:

What do you mean by information? Because if Aetna is my insurer, they know a lot? Their computers have a lot of information about what I've been treated for in the past?

MERLO:

Well, Steve, there's a lot of information out there. Think, today, what we can do with CVS Pharmacy, we know if a patient has not filled their medication on time. And the fact that they haven't, let's talk to the patient, let's find out why. So we're reacting to something after the event's occurred. I think the Aetna team has the ability of using the information that they have, in terms of how we can be more predictive. Someone who is demonstrating behaviors that have not resulted in an unintended consequence but we can engage and intervene with them before something unnecessary happens.

INSKEEP:

We should be frank also, you're running a business there. You want to make a profit. You want a merger to be profitable. Do you see yourself packaging services for people? Buy Aetna Insurance and we'll give you a discount on your drugs, or whatever that might be.

MERLO:

This combination is about reducing overall healthcare costs. And the ability to do that will allow us to bring products to market with lower premiums, perhaps lower deductibles, and that's how the system works.

INSKEEP:

So assuming this merger goes through and CVS and Aetna are the same company and someone walks in the doors of a CVS store with a prescription that they want filled. And their insurer is Cigna, some non-Aetna insurance company, are they going to pay more?

MERLO:

No Steve, they wouldn't. And we want to make these services available broadly in the marketplace. And that is not our goal, or our objective, as we go forward.

INSKEEP:

Do you want to expand even further? For example, bring doctors on board in some fashion, in the company that you're assembling here?

MERLO:

In the coming months, years, we're going to be testing and piloting a variety of alternatives that may include having physicians on site. I think that's something that we want to better understand as we go forward.

INSKEEP:

Oh, so my pharmacy might also be my doctor's office.

MERLO:

It potentially could be.

INSKEEP:

Didn't you get your start as a pharmacist?

MERLO:

I did. I started in 1978 as a pharmacist.

INSKEEP:

So how was the work that you were doing decades ago behind that pharmacy counter different from the work that you envision people in CVS stores doing 5 years from now, or 10 years from now?

MERLO:

There are some things that haven't changed over time. Maybe I'll start there. The pharmacist is the most accessible healthcare professional. Today, you can walk into a pharmacy all across the country. You can engage in a conversation, whether it's about your medication or some symptoms that you're experiencing and look for advice from the pharmacist. So I think what's evolving is that pharmacists can play an important role in terms of being a care coordinator and supporting, I keep referring to it as the care plan, that helps patients with chronic disease stay adherent to that care plan.

INSKEEP:

Larry Merlo of CVS Health. Thanks very much.

MERLO:

Thank you Steve.
