Will Arthur D. Lipson's plan unfreeze Auction Rate Securities?

Posted Mar 8th 2008 5:28PM by Peter Cohan

The New York Times reports that a distressed securities investor, Arthur D. Lipson, has a plan to unfreeze the accounts of those people who were suckered into thinking that Auction Rate Securities (ARSs) were as good as cash. But ARSs, whose rates were supposed to reset every week at about 3%, are illiquid because accounting rule changes made them quite unpopular with corporate treasurers. The resulting failed auctions have frozen the accounts.

I posted on this $330 billion ARS market last week and have been stunned to learn about all the people who thought that significant portions of their life savings were safe, only to learn that the funds are frozen. For these people, it's as if they went to the bank to withdraw their deposits and now they can't get their money out. I don't know how these people can sleep at night. I'd have trouble coping.

But Lipson argues that the closed-end funds that hold these ARSs are trading at a discount and that these discounts present an opportunity for closed-end funds to do the right thing, for both common and preferred shareholders. Lipson suggests that these closed-end funds' managers should sell the underlying securities - utility stocks and shares of real estate investment trusts - and use the proceeds to buy back common shares.

What good is that? Lipson thinks it would shrink the size of the funds and allow them to redeem some of the preferred shares they issued to increase the fund's yield. Unfortunately, Lipson believes that managers won't implement his plan because doing so would severely reduce the management fees they receive, based on the assets in the funds.

So Lipson has launched proxy fights at three funds, seeking board representation to try to force them to follow his prescription. I am glad the New York Times is covering this story and believe it warrants some serious government intervention.

Unfortunately, with Washington trying to plug a host of other leaks in our economic dike, these frozen ARS accounts may not get the attention they deserve.
